

Digital Giants

Public powers will never be that powerful.

There is a tremendous amount of potential good these companies can do if dedicating resources to good causes.

Designed by a few individual pioneers for the purpose of developing the spirit of collaboration, the web seems at the age of 30 to have turned evil. Global ecosystems confront global ecosystems. States run networks wipe out net neutrality. Individuals become data. Data turns into money. Despite being seen as positive, out of fatality that profits rules, or by sheer lack of any true alternatives, the dismantlement of the web giants will probably not happen according to the respondents. Turning them non profit would drastically reduce their innovation potential. They might be taxed, they could contribute more explicitly to generate positive impacts, but they will remain today's and tomorrow's reality. Maybe time itself is the only force for alternatives to emerge and raise to be the next giants. Nothing is eternal.
